The site of the Jamestown mining camp is southeast of the southern mountains of the Cactus Range.

It lies between two lines of north-west-southeast-trending mountains: the Trappman Hills to the west and the Gabbard Hills and Coyote Cuesta to the east.

The once-active camp developed in 1908. (See Gold Crater for historical setting.) Today no standing structures remain. About 20 yards north of the mine shaft and its tailings is a collapsed 10-foot-square wood-frame structure. The area is littered with cans and other debris from mining days.
